The leading theory of man's nature has been dominated by the assumptions of fixed intelligence and predetermined development. These beliefs have played a large role in psychological theorizing and investigation; they have provided a conceptual framework for the measurement of intelligence and for accounting for the development of human abilities, which have been regarded as the unfolding of capacities almost completely predetermined by inheritance. Recently, however, a transformation has been taking place in this traditional conception of intelligence and its relationship to experience. Evidence has been forcing a recognition of central processes in intelligence and of the crucial role of life experience in the development of these central processes. This transformation in the conception of intelligence and its roots is the subject of this book. This book is kind of a case history in behavioral science. It examines the historical roots of the assumptions of fixed intelligence and of predetermined development and the evidence that was interpreted to support them. It describes the changes that have taken place in the relevant portions of psychological and neuropsychological theory and reviews the investigations of learning sets, problem solving, and the effects of early experience on later problem solving capacity.
